

Today, as I take the opportunity to spend some time with my family over this summer period in the southern hemisphere (winter in the north), I was thinking of ideas to talk about.

It came to mind because of a conversation I had towards the end of last year (2018).

I get to work with a lot of pretty cool clients, and often as I get to know them, they are enthusiastic about growing their business, but don't want to be known as a salesperson.

What?

That's a pretty dumb statement, if you ask me.

I believe that everything is selling your product or service, and making a profit is based on your ability to sell.

Time and time again I hear from clients who don't know how to sell.

One in particular, a client who had decided to use a new vendor told the current one that they were moving, the vendor accepted that it was probably time for that client to move on. I had a first-hand advisory role with that vendor.

However, six months later, the same client sent emails to my vendor several times.

Guess what? He had $250K to spend and wanted my vendor to do it. The lead was there, but by simply not answering the email, the sale was gone. Dumb? The problem maybe a bit of pride, but they were not willing to accept that they had to swallow their pride and get back in there and sell.

If you want to dominate your niche you MUST become a MASTER at selling.

In this new year of 2019, study selling and work with your fellow colleagues to do the same.

Remember, everyone is selling, every minute of the day.

This year we are working on a study programme to help you get more sales. We will be launching over the next few months, and we will keep you posted.
