

The Power of Sales Frameworks

What is a Framework?- In sales, the simplest way to think of a framework is as a friend – someone that keeps you on track. A sales framework helps to provide you with a support system. Here are a couple of advantages.

Advantages of Implementing a Sales Framework

Saves Time- Any sales organisation is constantly looking at saving time. It's one of the core reasons they are always looking to measure and monitor.

From tracking activity to presenting a product or service in a way that helps and assists the salesperson make more sales.

Frameworks help you supercharge your sales efforts. When I owned NRS Media, we were absolutely obsessed with frameworks and processes. By choosing a suitable framework, we could focus our sales team on making sure that our processes were followed.

Protects IP

Some of our frameworks were unique to us; our “way of doing things” far outweighed our competition. In fact, we were “alone on the beach” for years before the competition caught on to us and then stole or copied some of our ideas.

People

People do play a big part in executing the frameworks. We had amazing people at NRS Media, always striving to make our system better, leaner, and more efficient. Testing, testing, testing.

Using frameworks allows you to test and improve. Never forget that your customer drives all your decision-making. When you adjust your framework, you can be confident that it's following the core principles of what you do.

The Types of Sales Frameworks.

Here are a couple:

- 1. Qualification:

Always figure out if your client is a fit or not. You should have a simple qualification framework to know if your client is warm, cold, or hot...

2. Presentation Framework

Do you have a structured approach to presenting your product or service?
