

I have a sales system that looks at building five key processes in a business.

I call it the ADA programme- Anchor- Decision-Action.

One of the key elements to this process is to build strong sales plans.

When talking to clients, I relate the story where I was on a senior management team of a radio station and we decided that we would create a hit list of all the clients that we did not have on the radio station. We called it the 'Wall of Clients'.

Monitor your competition

The first part of the plan was to monitor our competition. We listened, watched, and read about the advertisers who were not on our media company.

We then selected 30-40 clients who did not advertise with us, decided if they were a good fit for us, and then went after them.

Visualise your goal.

Any goal-setting program you read or hear about will tell you that if you have a goal you are committed to, then you need to write it down and visualise it.

We created a huge board in our sales office and wrote every advertiser from that list of 40 that we wanted to have on our media company.

Our goal was to have those clients advertising with us within 12 months; they would be either a long-term client or using us consistently to fit in with their advertising needs.

The truth is that it took us 15 months to get them all, but that one idea turned our business around.

How can this help you?

Create a top 40-50 clients who fit your profile of an ideal client

Write them up on board

Allocate them to members in your team

Build sales strategies around the acquisition of those clients

Set a time frame

Celebrate every new success
